All Ohio Life Sciences Research Symposium
May 20 & 21, 2011
OSU Museum of Biological Diversity
Room 1000, 1315 Kinnear Road
The Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio 43212

This symposium is designed and implemented as a multi-disciplinary forum to share research and inspire ideas. We invite all professionals and trainees involved in medicine, biological, physical and related social sciences to share their research and to learn about the research of others in this unique symposium. Most people think there is a “natural cross pollination” between research and applied life science disciplines, such as biology and medicine, or chemistry and pharmacy, but those connections are not always fostered. We are hosting this symposium to facilitate “cross pollination” of research and clinical interests, with the intent of bridging disciplines to encourage further research. The Friday workshop brings together biology researchers with medical practitioners in a distinctive training experience demonstrating the connection between the biology of plants and insects with the practice of allergy specialists. The Saturday competition is for graduate students, fellowship candidates and post-doc researchers of all life sciences in Ohio to present both basic life science research and applied medical applications of biology.
